RESURRECTION OF A FAKIR.

"It was on the way from Punnah to Bewah, in southern India," said the bronze-faced man. "Our party had just reached the dark bangalow about a for his final sleep, I succeeded, however, and assembled there near a large banyan tree a number of fakirs. Their tricks were more than usually clever, and they kept us amused for a considerable time. Finally, as a parting stroke, they suggested that for a small sum of money one of their party should be buried alive. Our curiosity was not proof against such a tempting offer, and the ruseals set to work.

"It did not take them long to make an excavation from seven to eight feet in length and two and a half feet wide at the top. When they got down about four feet they suddenly narrowed the grave to a width of two feet, leaving an even margin or bedge all around. Below this they due some two feet further, making a total depth of six feet.

A slim, wiry-looking chap, with a cast in his left eve, was selected as the victim. The chief takir, with the usual incantations and passes, soon had him rigid in a sort of hyphotic sleep; then wrapping him loosely in a white chot, he was lowered into the narrow part of the grave. Over him, resting upon the sandy ledge described, was placed a layer of thin boards to prevent the soil from coming in contact with his body. This done the others set to work with a will to showed in, trampling down the earth solidly every few minutes.

I must confess that by this time I felt a trifle qualmish. The scene was rather too realistic for my fancy. Could it be deliberate murder, and I an accessory to the act. A sickly feeling my uneasy looks, only ground and shoveled and stamped the harder. In about fifteen minutes they had afterwards sodded it evenly down.

Hand Painting By Machinery.

(New Tork Sun.)
A Springfield, Mass., inventor, R. P.
Winter, says he has realized in a recessily devised method, a long-felt desider-atum, viz. The reproduction, mechanic-ally, of hand painting on ribbed fashefes, with all the finest effects. The fashric is first treated with a filler applied in the form of a liquid, which has a physical affinity for the colors to be employed and little or no chemical effect on the asme-it also possesses the quality of drying into the fashrics, so as to become a part of the same after the picture has been reproduced, or of evaporating after such reproducing, this last quality being pre-ferable. On the fashrics having undergone this treatment, the ornament or mining is reproduced upon it by planographic cently devised method, a long-felt desiderprinting—stones or plates suitably pre-pared—and by the employment of colors which have an affinity for the surface from which the printing is done as also for the filler. The function effected by the use of planearaphic surfaces is to allow the colors to flow into the fiber of the fabric and into the ridges and valleys while the picture is printed without em-bossing it.
